

Written in 1846, this sonata was one of Chopin's final works, composed during a period of illness and exile. It followed the end of his long relationship with George Sand and coincided with years of political unrest in his native Poland. It reflects a period of introspection and quiet strength, where the dialogue between cello and piano feels both restrained and deeply human.